ISRAEL: No-Confidence Motions

Prime Minister Begin's success in winning the Knesset's approval for keeping former Defense Minister Sharon in the cabinet suggests he will have little trouble defeating several no-confidence motions criticizing his handling of the recommendations of the Beirut massacre inquiry commission. At least one coalition member, however, is threatening to vote against the government.

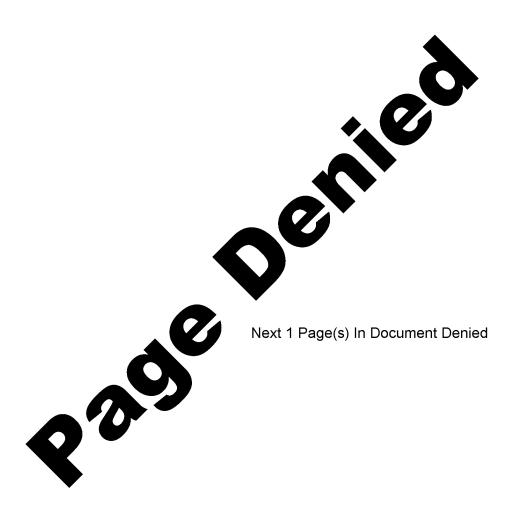

Meanwhile, Begin is meeting with leaders of Likud's Liberal faction to discuss Sharon's status and some new cabinet appointments. The Liberals want more seats in the cabinet in return for approving Ambassador Arens--a member of Begin's more conservative Herut Party--as Defense Minister. They also want Sharon's new duties to be narrowly limited.

PAKISTAN: Urban Unrest

Increasing unrest in major urban centers is testing the ability of municipal authorities to maintain order and could be exploited by President Zia's opponents. In Karachi, Sunni Muslim leaders have given authorities until Friday to meet their demands for action against Shias, including banning their religious processions. Bus and taxi drivers in the city--supported by student activists--are threatening to go on strike again to protest recent increases in fuel prices. In Lahore, police on Saturday reportedly beat and used tear gas against a group of prominent women attorneys protesting proposals to limit women's testimony in court.

Comment: If communal discord becomes violent, it could be difficult for municipal authorities to control and could embolden other dissatisfied groups to take to the streets. A sustained alliance of students and labor over economic issues would be a danger signal for Zia that his opposition is beginning to coalesce.

BANGLADESH: Political Disturbances

With political violence growing, the military regime is cracking down on political and student opponents. The daughter of Bangladesh's political founder was among 30 political leaders detained yesterday after she called for a nationwide protest tomorrow against martial law. On Monday police clashed with several thousand students at Dhaka University protesting martial law and government education policies. The government has closed the university, tightened enforcement measures against prohibited political activity, and imposed a curfew on the capital.

Comment: Despite the crackdown, student activists are likely to stage new protests next Monday, the anniversary of the martyrdom of student protesters in the 1950s. Political parties probably will have to increase support of the students to maintain their political credibility. Ambitious military officers, critical of General Ershad's leadership, may exploit these incidents as they try to develop their own support.

CHILE: Economic Cabinet Changes

President Pinochet's cabinet shuffle this week has raised doubts about the government's ability to revive the economy and to resume external debt payments. According to the US Embassy, the new financial team of Finance Minister Caceress and Economy Minister Martin lacks the stature to resolve Chile's financial problems. In announcing the shakeup, Pinochet attacked domestic critics and said there would be no major changes in economic policies.

Comment: The changes will do little to restore confidence, and foreign bankers probably will be more cautious in supporting Santiago's requests to restore credits and renegotiate maturing debt. Caceress and Martin will have to resolve the issue of government guarantees for private-sector foreign borrowings to get the stalled debt renegotiations back on track. Until this problem is resolved, bankers are likely to resist new lending. This will hinder financing of necessary imports and could lead to additional domestic bankruptcies.

Special Analysis
EL SALVADOR: The Military Balance
During the last several months, the insurgents have increasingly demonstrated a capability to overrun small towns and isolated military garrisons, thereby inflicting heavier losses on government personnel. The Army has responded again with large-scale sweep operations against guerrilla strongholds. These actions continue to have little lasting impact, however, and the government has little prospect of substantially weakening insurgent resistance before the elections in March 1984. The government probably hopes that, with continued US assistance, it can at least regain the initiative over the next year.	25X ²
Some 3,500 government troops were killed or wounded in 1982, an increase of more than 20 percent from the previous year. Losses have been particularly high since mid-October, when the insurgents began a series of offensives that are continuing sporadically.	25X1
The insurgents also have captured large numbers of prisoners, including over 250 in late 1982. They subsequently released the prisoners in an attempt to weaken the military's willingness to fight.	25X1
In addition, government forces conceded insurgent control, at least temporarily, over large areas of eastern Chalatenango and northern Morazan Departments. This has strengthened the morale of the guerrillas, who claim some of these areas are "liberated." The insurgents also have seized upon recent political infighting in the Constituent Assembly and the officer corps to underscore the disunity in San Salvador.	25X1
Persistent Problems
The government has failed to take full advantage of the strengthening of the armed forces over the past year to gain a military advantage. The Air Force now has 18 UH-1H helicopters and six A-37 counterinsurgency aircraft, and the Army has two new US-trained and two Venezuelan-trained battalionsbringing total military and security personnel to more than 30,000. The new units,
